WEATHER KEY POINTS

12/30/19 - 01/05/20

Monday-Tuesday

- Rain and mountain snow showers will continue across Southern Region through Monday night
 - The snow amounts and duration will both be significantly less than the storm last week, but some travel impacts are still possible due to accumulating snow above about 3,000 feet
 - Note: Expected storm total precipitation and impacts have both decreased compared to forecasts over the weekend
 - Locally moderate rainfall could produce minor urban flooding concerns, but significant impacts are not expected on burn scars
 - Yesterday's concerns about the Ferguson burn scar have ended
 - There is a chance of thunderstorms today, primarily along the coast
- Gusty northeasterly winds will develop across prone areas of Inland and Southern Regions on Monday and Tuesday, with gusts 40-60 mph possible in portions of Southern Region

Wednesday-Sunday

- A few weak storm systems will bring rain and mountain snow to far northern California, with dry weather for the rest of the state
 - No significant impacts are currently expected through this period
